C. elegans has been used extensively as a model organism for the study of biological processes during development and aging. The biology of C. elegans provides insights into the evolutionarily conserved pathways involved in cell-cell communication and intercellular signaling. C. elegans is widely used as a model system for the study of human diseases including diabetes, cardiovascular disease, neurodegenerative disease, obesity, cancer and autism. As a simple organism, C. elegans has emerged as a powerful genetic and molecular genetic model system for the study of the biology of many human diseases. The biology of C. elegans is similar to humans, but the study of C. elegans offers the advantage of genetic tractability. Furthermore, the genome of C. elegans has been completely sequenced, enabling us to understand the regulatory networks that control the development and function of various tissues and organs. In this review, we describe how C. elegans has been used to study the biology of human diseases. Texas Business Leadership Center The Texas Business Leadership Center (TBLC) is a collaboration between the University of Texas at Austin and the Center for Public Policy Priorities, a liberal interest group in Austin, Texas. According to the Center, its goals are to "partner with business in Texas to improve education, jobs and economic growth and strengthen the Texas economy for all." The TBLC's creation was spearheaded by then-Republican Rep. Rob Eissler of The Woodlands, who served as Chairman of the House Committee on Education from 1995 until 2003. According to the Center, Eissler "pursued the creation of a Center for business development as a way to have business support education reforms. Eissler wanted to make sure the reforms would benefit Texas' high-growth businesses." According to the Center, the TBLC was founded as "a way to overcome the perception that there is no business community in Texas. Business leaders actually are in the Governor's Mansion, and members of the business community head
