Adult neural stem cells (aNSCs) can be isolated from the adult brain and maintained in culture, whereas embryonic stem cells (ESCs) can be generated from the inner cell mass of the developing blastocyst. In theory, the two types of stem cells could be employed to generate neuronal cells that might be used in cell replacement strategies for neurological disorders. One challenge to this approach is that the aNSCs and ESCs are not readily amenable to in vitro differentiation into the different neuronal cell types required to restore neurological function. Neuronal cells with the most sophisticated functions, the cerebral cortex, are generated late in gestation and migrate to the telencephalon during the first two weeks post-conception. They are generated in ventricular zones (VZ) located along the ventricular walls of the dorsal, lateral, and medial cerebral lobes. As these cells mature, they migrate radially, first to the subventricular zone (SVZ), and then to their final destination in the cortex. During the early stages of neurogenesis, the ventricular neuroepithelium (NE) is composed of a single, apparently homogenous layer of cells, but the further ventricular neurogenesis progresses, the NE becomes divided into three zones. The central most ventricular VZ is composed of a thick layer of neuroepithelial cells, referred to as radial glia, which are connected by extensive apical processes, giving the NE a papyrus appearance. Radial glia give rise to intermediate progenitor cells (type B cells) and these in turn give rise to basal progenitor cells (type C cells). Type A cells constitute the outermost layer of ventricular neurogenesis and give rise to the earliest born neurons in the cortex. In the developing cortex, cells in the ventricular zone are initially multipotent and differentiate into neuroblasts, also referred to as intermediate progenitors, which express markers of both radial glia and type A cells and migrate both radially and tangentially towards the pial surface. Neuroblasts continue to differentiate along radial glia and type B progenitor cell lines, as well as b7e8fdf5c8
